Sweet Success in Improving Diabetes Care

By Jessica Nicholas

Project Dulce, a Whittier Institute for diabetes at Scripps Memorial Hospital, has been working to help improve diabetes education for underserved groups. The group is seeking to improve diabetes awareness among minorities, as it is a condition that affects people of all races.

Project Dulce is a program designed to help people from different backgrounds understand and manage their diabetes. The group works with patients to teach them how to control their blood sugar levels and prevent complications. They offer a variety of services, such as free health services, education, and support for diabetes patients.

In addition to providing care, Project Dulce also seeks to address health care issues that affect underserved communities. They aim to provide services to those who may not have access to traditional medical care.

The program has received praise for its efforts to help improve diabetes education and management. It has received funding from various sources, including the American Diabetes Association.

Although Project Dulce is located in Los Angeles, they serve patients from throughout Southern California. The group has received recognition for its work in improving diabetes care among underserved populations.
